

ON PARTY LOYALTY

"To some Democrats, party loyalty means a lot. And it starts at the top. We are proud of being part of the national Democratic Party. We feel that it provides the inspiration--and the policies--from which our state and local organizations should derive their own political base. Though we on the state and local level must constantly concern ourselves with the shortcomings of our national party, in order to insure its competency, we must do so in a constructive manner, standing always ready to aid our party at election time.

"Today we are fortunate to be living during a dynamic Democratic administration. The American public is seeing more done by Lyndon Johnson and the current U. S. Congress than in any era since the New Deal. Each day our citizens sigh in relief, that the outcome of the '64 election was a mandate for our President,--and that the tragedy of a Goldwater election was avoided."
